

Constitution & Bylaws General Language

All organizations should have governing documents—constitutions and bylaws—which define the organization's name and objectives, qualifications of members, officers and their election, meetings and how amendments to these documents are made. The constitution's foundational rules and structures are, by design, more difficult to change and require notice and 2/3 vote to amend. Rules of a more temporary nature, which may be changed from time to time, should not be contained in the constitution.

Also, because a local chapter is a chartered sub-unit of the state and national organizations, the chapter's constitution and bylaws cannot conflict with that of the state and national organization. Standards for membership, degrees of membership and qualifications for officers may be more stringent than what is prescribed in the state and national constitutions, but may not be a lower standard.

Bylaws are a companion document to the constitution and frequently, the constitution and bylaws together are considered to be one document. The bylaws include more procedural detail than what would be contained in a constitution and while notice is required for amendment, the chapter may opt to have such amendments adopted by either 2/3 or majority vote.

Unless otherwise stated within the governing documents, provisions of the constitution and bylaws may not be suspended. Organizations should also adopt standing rules—sometimes called policies and procedures—operational “hands and feet” within the framework of the governing documents. Such rules or policies are the preferred place for details and prescriptions which should never encumber the bylaws. For example, the chapter may adopt specific rules and procedures for officer elections, award selections, travel policies, competitive team selection, and junior membership. Rules and policies cannot conflict with the constitution and bylaws but may be suspended.

When creating and proposing a new constitution and bylaws, the organization should have an elected committee or task force convened to develop and present the document. In an established chapter, this could be the executive committee or an ad hoc (special) committee created for this purpose. If the organization has an existing constitution and bylaws and desires to make sweeping changes, it may present a constitutional revision—a new document to supplant the old—rather than proposing each amendment piecemeal. In general, the document should be presented with an intervening period to follow before the organization considers its adoption. Most chapters require 30 days notice. This should allow the chapter to propose the revision or new document at one monthly meeting and post the proposed adoption at the next monthly meeting. This provides an element of previous notice and the opportunity for the membership to reflect and consider the proposal. The proposed document can be distributed at the meeting but also posted online or discussed in class. It is always advisable to submit the proposal to campus and/or career and technical education administrators for review.

As part of the chapter's annual planning processes, the officers and/or the executive committee should review the chapter's constitution and bylaws to ensure familiarity with the document and to possibly consider amendments to better meet the needs of the organization, or perhaps policies which better clarify and mobilize the constitutional provisions. The constitution and bylaws should never become overly detailed and prescriptive, but should provide the framework for policy decisions. Frequently, adoption of clarifying policies or rules is preferable to constitutional amendments.

Operational transparency is vitally important in any organization. It is important that an organization's members and stakeholders have full access to the chapter's constitution and bylaws, as well as other policies and procedures. Posting these items on your website or distributing them through a chapter handbook is considered a best practice to ensure transparency. Of course, it is vitally important that the chapter adhere to its constitutional provisions.
